When I began creating my sitemap, I took a lot of inspiration from the site of the PW alum that I interviewed, as well as the websites of other PW alumni. At the beginning of my design process, I had absolutely no idea what I wanted to put on my website, because I felt as though I had not done enough to have projects and pages of substance to put on it. However, as I looked at other web I started to believe that I had content for my website, and from there I developed the pages that I have on my sitemap.

I have a very basic design currently, consisting of four different pages that branch off from my home page. They are all very self-explanatory, starting with the “about” page, on which I plan to write a little blurb about myself and include a picture. I will also have a contact page, on which I will include various mean of communication with me, such as email and LinkedIn. From there I decided that, since this is a portfolio, a portfolio tab was necessary, and on there I will be putting a couple projects from high school, and as I continue on, I will add pieces. The final section of my website was something that I picked up on as I continued to browse websites. I noticed that everyone had a resume section, and I thought this was an excellent idea, to get my resume out there, and thus my website was completed.
